Penn Mutual Life Insurance

Company. We print in another column the annual statement of this company, from which it appears that the assets are, in round numbers, nearly six million dollars. The liabilities, or, in other words, the money held to pay the losses by deaths money held to pay the losses by deaths or to reinsure the policies issued, in case the company should stop business, are forty-seven hundred thousand dollars, leaving a surplus of one million two hundred thousand dollars belonging to the policy holders, as this is a purely mutual thousand dollars, as this is a purely mutual the policy holders, as this is a purely mutual to the companions.

from the Company is, substantialtons for the State normal school and its condition of the company is, substantially, as reported.

The general subject of life insurance and the statements of the various compa nies are likely, as they should, to underthan 2,000 population, was read a second because of the failure and embarassment of several prominent institutions. The Penn Mutual has formed in this city a local board, composed of well known business men, each of whom represent a policy of ten thousand dollars insurance. The board will have such connection with the principal office as will afford our feitizens a more intimate acquaintance with the working of the company, and the character of its officers. We are informed that it is a part of the policy of the company to loan in this State, upon approved real estate security, the reserve fund accruing from all premiums paid within the State, thus affording the policy holders residing here the evidence that the moneys of the company are prudently invested.

The subject of Life Insurance has been exhaustively discussed for more than a century by political economists, who have generally admitted the soundness of the policy. The important question now is, are the companies conducted upon sound principles; and with skill and fidelity? Each policy holder should as carefully investigate the character of his company as he would the bank in which he deposits his savings or the go a more rigid scrutiny than heretofore his company as he would the bank in the control of Charleston, in the court which he deposits his savings or the building association to which he nave his Mr. Wilson, the bill was laid on the building association to which he pays his table dues. This is rendered almost impossible, as the prominent companies are gen erally remote, and the working of insur ance business intricate, and to the majority of policy holders incomprehensible.

A local board, composed of the right kind of men, can to a considerable extent remedy this difficulty, if they properly investigate the character of the company and make themselves familiar with the method and details of the business. Their indorsement will inspire confidence, and greatly promote the interest of both the company and the policy holder.
